Stratigraphic Tops of the Smackover Formation in Southern Arkansas

Peng Li

Introduction

The Smackover Formation is a subsurface unit in southern Arkansas, underlying approximately 7,000 square miles (Fig. 1). It gradually thickens southward from the northern limit where it thins markedly due to erosion during post-Buckner and post-Lower Cretaceous time (Vestal, 1950). In the southwestern corner of the state, the thickness of the Smackover Formation is probably more than 1,200 feet. Bingham (1937) named the formation after the Smackover Field in Union County, Arkansas, where it first produced oil. Commercial production from the Smackover began in 1936 in the Snow Hill Field of Ouachita County in the Phillips Petroleum Company No. 1 J. D. Reynolds well, Sec. 27, T. 15S, R. 15W, producing 40 million cubic feet of gas per day and some distillate (Weeks, 1938). Since then, approximately 151 fields have produced more than 500 million bbls of oil and condensate from the Smackover.

The Smackover Formation formed in the Oxfordian stage of the Jurassic Period and is typically underlain by either the Norphlet Formation or the Louann Salt where the Norphlet pinches out in the northern updip (Fig. 2). It is conformably overlain by the Buckner Member of the Haynesville Formation that is composed mainly of red shale in the upper part and white to pink anhydrite in the lower part. The Buckner serves as a seal for the Smackover reservoir where present. It is locally absent, as in the Atlanta and Shuler fields, due to truncation during pre-Cotton Valley time, and may vary in thickness up to 300 feet.

In southern Arkansas, the Smackover Formation is divided into two informal members (Imlay, 1940). The upper member is an oolitic to chalky porous limestone. All oil and gas production in the unit comes from the uppermost porous, permeable, oolitic zone that is called the Reynolds oolite (Weeks, 1938), with one exception in the Midway Field, which produces from a second deeper zone that is termed the Bond zone (Markley and Valerius, 1942). This zone is composed of granular, almost completely non-oolitic, porous, and permeable limestone. The remainder of the upper part of the Smackover is chalky white limestone with disseminated dolomite rhombs. The lower member (locally known as the Brown Dense) is composed of dense argillaceous limestone and dark calcareous shale, and has been determined to serve as an effective regional source rock in the onshore interior salt basins in the north central and northeastern Gulf of America (Akin and Graves, 1969; Mancini et al., 2005).

Methodology

This study covered 13 counties in southern Arkansas, south of Township 11 South. Electric logs from 3,903 wells in this region were used to identify the stratigraphic top of the Smackover Formation. Variations in log responses show that the Buckner Member is distinct from the underlying Smackover Formation. Anhydrite of the Buckner Member usually exhibits little to no deflection from the shale baseline on the spontaneous potential (SP) log (left track) and extremely high values on the resistivity logs (right track) because anhydrite is not permeable enough for significant electrochemical currents to form (Fig. 3). Smackover core samples and cuttings, well completion reports, and driller's logs of certain wells were also examined to verify the formation tops from the well logs. The picks of Smackover tops in the report were made in a consistent manner based on the author's interpretation.

The Smackover wells in the tables were grouped by county and listed in the order of permit number. Other well information included the American Petroleum Institute (API) number, well name, field name, legal information, total depth, and kelly bushing depth.

A series of well location maps that include oil field names for the Smackover Play in southern Arkansas (three regional maps and 13 county maps) were published earlier and contain the same wells used for this report (Li and Mills, 2019). They can be found on our website under the Smackover Base Map Series in the Fossil Fuel Maps within the Maps and Data tab.
